

RESEARCHING YOUR NATIVE AMERICAN ANCESTRY

Barbara LaClair, November 2020

BASIC METHODS THE SAME AS FOR ANY ANCESTOR:

- Start with what you know, and work backward, one step at a time
- Check for documents at home
- Ask family members what they know, what documents they have
- Begin to search other records and source materials (online AND offline)
- All the usual genealogical resources still apply: census, vital records, probate, deeds, etc.

THE KEY TO NATIVE AMERICAN RESEARCH IS TO KNOW THE TRIBE!

IF YOUR ANCESTOR MAINTAINED CLOSE TIES TO HIS/HER TRIBE, YOUR RESEARCH WILL BE EASIER. IF NOT, TRIBAL AFFILIATION IS THE FIRST QUESTION THAT MUST BE ANSWERED.

IF YOU DON'T KNOW THE TRIBE:

Study the history and context for the location and time period where your "Indian" ancestor lived.

- What tribes resided in the vicinity?
- What opportunities for interaction?

Narrow the list of likely tribes, and then begin to look at their resource materials

Look at ALL records pertaining to the ancestor of interest, and look for any suggestion of Native American race, or affiliation with others of Native American heritage (note: documentation of race is often not reliable, but search anyway)

NATIVE AMERICANS IN U.S CENSUS POPULATION SCHEDULES

For Indians residing on Reservations or with their tribes:

- 1900 Census
The 1900 census includes a separate Indian Population Schedule by county. The 1900 census included the individual's Indian and English name, asking tribe of this Indian, tribe of his father, and tribe of his mother, percent of Indian blood in the individual and the parents, education, and land allotment information.
- 1910 Census
The 1910 census has a section called "Special Inquiries Related to Indians" asking tribe of this Indian, tribe of his father, tribe of his mother, percent of Indian and other blood. Also asks education, land allotment, and marriage information.

For Indians not residing on reservations with their tribes, they should be recorded in general Census Population Schedules, but race may not be reliably recorded.

SOURCES AND RESOURCES UNIQUE TO NATIVE AMERICAN RESEARCH:

- Tribal rolls and censuses (1887 – 1940s) – should include all enrolled tribal members, even if not living on the reservation
- DAWES Application packets (Five Civilized Tribes – Cherokee, Choctaw, Creek, Chickasaw, Seminole) – family interviews contain rich genealogical information. Rejected applications just as valuable as those who were approved.
- Vital records recorded by the Agency – Births, Deaths, Marriages
- Special tribal surveys – Industrial Surveys 1922, Health Surveys, etc.
- Indian School and Mission Records
- Church/ Missionary records
- Land records – Allotment records, Trust Lands
- Probate records – administered by Indian Agencies
- Agency Correspondence and Payroll records
- Ethnographic, anthropology studies

DNA Testing

Testing may reveal that you have some DNA consistent with patterns unique to Indigenous populations; it will not identify the Tribe, or the exact blood quantum.

Is generally more helpful in proving a blood relationship to another individual.
